Model Legislation for Accountability in Economic Development: Unified Economic Development Budget

BACKGROUND

The purpose of a Unified Economic Development Budget (UEDB) is to provide policymakers and taxpayers with a comprehensive accounting of all economic development spending—all in one place.

This is critical for two reasons. First, because different agencies handle different programs, the records are not combined, and they may be reported in non-uniform ways that make comparisons difficult. Second, some forms of tax expenditures—especially corporate income tax credits—have historically been far less transparent in some states than other kinds of tax breaks (such as property tax abatements available at county tax assessors’ offices).

That’s a big problem, because for many states, tax spending for economic development dwarfs appropriated spending, by ratios of 4-to-1, 6-to-1 or even higher. In times of fiscal stress, that causes some states to make distorted decisions. For example, they may cut appropriations (such as worker retraining programs) while not touching tax breaks (such as enterprise zone credits).

When public officials have to make tough budget decisions, they should be able to see all forms of spending for economic development so they can make fully informed and balanced decisions based on a complete picture of the whole development budget.

Although several states have enacted something called a Unified Economic Development Budget (UEDBs), some are too incomplete to be considered as models (such as Texas and Illinois) and others are still falling short of their potential as enacted. The language here draws upon the best UEDBs enacted so far. It also reflects several “do it yourself” UEDBs published by state tax and budget watchdog groups.
